HARVEST 2004:

A deep winter freeze and spring rains resulted in very low-yielding vines with inconsistent berry size. A dry and mild summer followed through mid-September, when Oregon was again subjected to stormy weather of hail and rain. Fortunately, the end of September brought warm, dry weather with light winds to dry up the vines and finish ripening at a leisurely pace. All of these events resulted in beautiful freshness and Oregon's trademark intense fruit flavors.
